This roundtable examines the changing contemporary landscape of multilateralism. What are the prospects for international cooperation through established multilateral institutions in today's world of growing multipolarity, heightened tensions between old and new leading states, widespread anti-globalist populism, intractable major wars, rise of authoritarian governments, and other challenges to the liberal international order? Is the existing multilateral system basically resilient; or does it require major reform; or should we anticipate the rise of competing global bodies led by new powers, such as BRICS; or will international cooperation increasing reorient from the global to the regional level; or some other scenario? Join us for a crucial debate!
